ABSTRACT

This issue focuses on a variety of performance measurement and outcome data resources as they relate to evaluating service delivery performance in areas that include employment (welfare-to-work and performance bonuses for work participation) and child welfare, as well as some general Temporary Assistance to Needy Families program areas. It also looks at the challenges of effective performance evaluation across different types of agencies--government, non-profit, and for-profit. A background section lists Welfare Information Network (WIN) sites for information regarding performance measurement, research, and evaluation and a Finance Project Web site devoted to information about better results for children, families, and communities. The next section describes nine "Publications and Electronic Resources" and lists their Web sites. A section on "What States/Agencies Are Doing" discusses activities and lists applicable Web sites for Alabama, Arizona, Kentucky, New York City, and Oklahoma. Web sites for 10 resource contacts are then listed. (YLB)

A Look at How Agencies Can Utilize Outcome and Performance Data To Enhance Service Delivery

Background

Increasingly states and localities are seeking to improve program outcomes. They are developing new methods of documentation, evaluation, accountability and reporting.

The downturn of America's economy and shrinking state and local resources are raising concern about how human service agencies will respond to the needs of the low-income population. As caseloads continue to rise, expenditures will increase and human service agencies will need to evaluate programs and appraise the ways in which they can maximize service deliverables to respond to the increasing needs of the low-income and welfare population within financial constraints.

This Resource for Welfare Decisions will focus on a variety of performance measurement and outcome data resources as they relate to evaluating service delivery performance in areas that include employment (welfare-to-work and performance bonuses for work participation), and child welfare, as well as some general TANF program areas. This Resource will also look at the challenges of effective performance evaluation across different types of agencies—government, non-profit, and for-profit.

For more information regarding performance measurement, refer to the Welfare Information Network's (WIN) performance management page at <http://www.welfareinfo.org/performance.html>. For information on research and evaluation, see WIIN's Research, Reference and Data Resources page at <http://www.welfareinfo.org/homeresearch.html>. The Finance Project also has a website devoted to information around better results for children, families and communities. Visit the web page at <http://www.financeproject.org/betterresults.htm>.

The Annie E. Casey Foundation and the National Academy of Public Administration, High Performance Partnership, 2001. This project supports the use of high performance partnerships among public, nonprofit, and civic organizations. The first phase will develop a resource guide that documents the current state of high performance public/nonprofit partnerships and identifies relevant trends and best practices. The second phase involves the construction of design laboratories in communities that have actually established high performance partnerships with local government, civic and nonprofit entities. What States/Agencies are Doing

The Alabama Department of Human Services- has created a multi-tiered quality control system that provides a structured method of program analysis. The system monitors, evaluates and provides feedback on several programs and services under the agency's scope. The department conducts a continuous review process that evaluates the outcomes of children and families receiving programs/assistance, analyzes the department current systems, monitors programs for federal compliance, and recommends restructuring programs and services that are not operating efficiently. The Quality Assurance System is a collaborative effort of several departments—Office of Quality Assurance in the Family Services Division, State Quality Assurance Committee, Quality Assurance Coordinator in each County Department and Local Quality Assurance Committees. Call The Family Services Division at 334/242-9500. See <http://www.dhr.state.al.us/fsd.qa.asp>

The Arizona Department of Health and Human Services has a 2000-2001 Master List of State Government Programs report that reflects several aspects of the agency's overall operations, such as budgeting, funds allocation, program analysis, performance measurement and mission statements. See <http://www.state.az.us/ospb/mlist/hsa.pdf>.

The Commonwealth of Kentucky Cabinet for Families and Children has created the Office of Performance Enhancement. The Division of Outcome Based Contracts handles most of the contracting in child welfare service. In the Division of Quality Improvement, a quality control unit handles the monitoring of public assistance programs and Food Stamps; a quality initiatives unit handles caseworker and site reviews and appeals filed by clients, and a contracts accountability unit monitors all of the contracts held by the agency to ensure compliance with federal guidelines. There are also 2000 and 2001 Outcome Measurement Reports available. The reports helped to expedite and improve children's placement in programs and services, to facilitate customer and client feedback, and to develop innovative data management and collection tools. For more information on the Office of Performance Enhancement, contact Mark Neff or see http://cfc.state.ky.us/agencies/Performance_Enh/index.asp. For more information on the Outcome Reports, contact Gary Harp or see <http://cfc.state.ky.us/outcomes2000/>. Both can be reached at 502/564-6750.

New York City's Human Resources Administration's Citywide Accountability Program (CAP) generates monthly reports that reflect key indicators of the city's welfare caseload such as: reported job placement rate, 3-month recidivism for employed TANF cases returning to welfare, fair hearing win rate, public assistance caseload change rate, public assistance city dependency rate and public assistance benefits expended. These indicators and the accompanying table can be found at http://www.nyc.gov/html/hra/html/news_citywide.html. The Human Resource Administration also developed the JobStat program in 1998. JobStat is a performance management support program for city job centers. JobStat generates the JobStat report that is used by senior level managers to analyze overall and individual center performance. More detailed information about the JobStat report can be found at <http://www.nyc.gov/html/hra/pdf/jobstatguide2.0.pdf>. There are also additional reports available that reflect each of the Job Centers JobStat monthly reports. Visit http://www.nyc.gov/html/html/center_job_stat.html.

Oklahoma Milestone Payment System utilizes a performance based reimbursement system as an incentive for improved service delivery and outcomes in employment initiatives. This program was developed by the Community Rehabilitation Services Unit of the Oklahoma Department of Rehabilitation Services. The reimbursement system is based on outcomes for the consumer.
